President Johnson is planning an important foreign policy speech in New York Monday in which he is expected to announce a large new cutback in American production of material for nuclear warheads.

About a 45-per-cent cut in the rate of United States production of fissionable material for weapons is anticipated, it was learned.

The President will review American foreign policy and stress his determination to seek out paths toward disarmament and peace. He will be addressing the annual meeting of Associated Press editors and publishers.

Announcement of the added cutback in nuclear weapons production is intended to give evidence of the President's desire to build on the East-West tension-reducing policy of the late President Kennedy.

Mr. Johnson met yesterday for about an hour with Soviet Ambassador Anatoly F. Dobrynin for what the White House described as "a general discussion of Soviet-American relations." Whether the President gave the Ambassador a preview of his Monday remarks was not known last night.

The White House added that
